Steve Sweeney and Andree Powers, Mr and Mrs Roland Delmei and Mr and Mrs Wayne Irwin. The four judges were Mayor Ron Pettem and Mrs Pettem and Centennial Chairman, John Dunn and Mrs Dunn.

Fungus thrives in humidity

Hot, humid weather makes your garden plants vulnerable to a host of fungus diseases.

"When a plant gets wet in the rain and stays wet because of humidity, it is susceptible to fungus diseases," says Bob Fleming, Ontario ministry of agriculture and food horticulturist. "The fungus spores float in the air and breed on garden plants that haven't had a chance to dry out."

Almost all garden plants are fair game for a range of fungus spores — mildew, leaf spot disease, stem rots and botrytis — and each fungus develops special characteristics.

"Mildew, the most common of these diseases, produces a powdery growth on the under-surface of the leaves," says Fleming. "A downy substance may also form on the leaves and fruit. Botrytis is marked by a fluffy, gray mold, brown stems and soft mushy textures."

"Prevention is the only way to deal with these diseases," says Fleming. "Follow a good spray program with an insecticide such as Captain or Benlate and make sure the undersurface of the leaf is well coated."

Other preventive measures include watering plants during the early day so they will be dry at night, and removing any infected matter as soon as you see it.

Don't crowd garden plants and don't disturb them after a heavy rain when fungus spores are most likely to spread. Healthy vigorous plants are least likely to be infected with plant diseases.
