Home study management course from Guelph features tips on financial organization

Farmers are beefing up their financial management skills with a new home study course from the University of Guelph. "Farm Financial Management," a joint effort by Independent Study and Agricultural Representatives Branch, OMAF, is teaching farmers to organize, analyze, plan and understand — in short, to become better managers.

Better management reaps bigger profits. Through a series of seven lessons, "Farm Financial Management" examines the central issues of managing a farm business. Lessons cover: farm management principles, collecting and arranging farm records, the balance sheet, the income statement, how to develop a sound farm plan using partial and enterprise budgets and cash flow projections.

The final lesson discusses farm financing. Real-life examples and exercises throughout the course give practice in preparing and analysing financial statements.

After completing the course, farmer-owner operators, their partners and/or spouses will be better prepared to make the right decisions on tough questions — and have more confidence dealing with bankers, accountants and consultants. The payoff should be lower stress and higher profits.

"Farm Financial Management" is available from Independent Study in January 1986. The cost of the course package is $100. The price covers all print materials, mailing and marking. A 25 minute video-tape is also available for a $25 rental (refundable) or purchase fee. In addition, a certificate in Farm Financial Management is awarded for successful completion of three mail-in assignments.

Independent Study offers over 60 correspondence courses in agriculture and horticulture. For busy adults who want more training but can't attend classes, home study is a convenient alternative. The kitchen table becomes a classroom, the instructor's voice is on cassette tape and there are no strict assignment deadlines.
