Electrologist offers a wide range of services from her Almonte salon

By Lois Tuffin
Gazette reporter

Electrolysis has come to Almonte in the form of Jean Morgan.

The England native brought her business to Almonte over a year ago after tiring of commuting to Ottawa to work there. She now works out of her Euphemia Street home on a part-time basis.

Ms. Morgan said she trained in England with Kree International 25 years ago, then opened two of their salons along England's south coast. She has worked in Ottawa and Kanata since coming to Canada 10 years ago.

She provides a variety of services which include manicures, pedicures, facials, make-up application, waxing and back massages, but she said electrolysis is her drawing card. Since setting up shop in Almonte, Ms. Morgan said she has drawn clients from Carleton Place, Arnprior, Carp and even Ottawa.

Her method of hair removal is called "the blend," a combination of a short-wave current that cauterizes the hair root and a galvanizing or alternating current that dissolves the root with lye. She said this way is more gentle to the skin than the hot short-wave and faster than the three centuries old galvanizing method.

One of Ms. Morgan's clients, a regular who followed her from her Ottawa salon, said she finds "the blend" more comfortable than the short-wave method she had experienced before. She added the redness of the skin is less severe and does not last as long.

Ms. Morgan removes the hair by inserting a probe, a minute needle, into a pore from which a hair extends. She then sends a small current into the pore (which her client said tickles a little), killing the root and allowing her to slide, not pull, the hair out.

Jean Morgan patiently works one hair at a time on a client's face in her Euphemia Street salon. The process "tickles a little," according to this woman.

She explained it is important for people to realize the process does not involve injections.

Ms. Morgan said she has treated few men, removing hair from their hands, between their eyebrows, their faces or their shoulders.
